

Abstract

The recent floods have destroyed 8,000 acres of farmland, yet agriculture supports up to 75 per cent of the population. They also caused structural damage to buildings, loss of homes and livelihoods, disruption of key transport and communication networks and often-fatal landslides. Water-borne diseases are more likely to spread due to stagnant water and contaminated groundwater.